P.S. Königsberg, the city of Immanuel Kant, would have been 750 years old in 2005. It was the capital of the German province of “Ostpreussen” (East Prussia) till April 1945. During the following two years the Soviet military administration had it ethnically cleansed. The population, those who had not fled or been killed before, were driven westwards or shipped to Siberia or killed – millions of people. Since then the city and the province, emptied completely of Germans and all German traces which were removed and completely destroyed, are called Kaliningrad. This forms part of today’s (2007) Russia, according to the World War II Allies’ Yalta agreements.
